The San Joaquin Valley is a special place. It has a rich, diverse population, communities that blend rural calm with urban amenities, and an unrivaled agricultural economy. These qualities also mean the region will grow. In the next 40 years, it is expected that we will more than double in population from 3.3 million to more than 7 million. But with growth comes challenges.

Where will the roads go?

What type of housing should be built and where?

How will this growth affect our environment?
